It is a certain cure for all the ailments peculiar to the delicate organization of women. It is perfectly safe in any condition of the system and always reliable, regulating the delicate organs to prevent their work painlessly. Women have yellow faces, dull eyes, hollow cheeks, and low spirits, when they are made miserable with disorders, discharges and weaknesses peculiar to their sex. Health is regained, after periods of nervous prostration, pain and constipation, or other manifestations of the displacement of the womanly system, when the "Prescription" is used.

A Terrible Experience.
The Roman Catholic Church of the Holy Innocents is in Thirty-seventh street, just west of Broadway, New York. It is on the south side of the street and is separated by a narrow alley from the rear of the Hotel Marlborough. The roof slants from the central nave at a sharp angle to the alley, which is below the street level and at least 60 feet beneath the roof's gutter. A wing of the hotel shoots back at right angles to the church in the rear, and, fortunately, as it turned out, a hotel window opens directly upon the roof.
Repairs are required upon this slate covered roof, and Michael Fitzsimmons, the contractor, sent Charles Kline to do the work. John Page, who has been 16 years in Fitzsimmons' employ, was assigned to help him.

The men ran a ladder from the alley up to the roof Tuesday morning, and ascended it. Kline went first, and was soon busily engaged in mending the roof. Page went up later, taking materials with him. The two worked steadily for a while without speaking. Then Page began to act peculiarly as though he were ill, but as he disclaimed any ailment Kline paid him no attention.

It was about the middle of the morning when Kline, hearing a peculiar sliding noise, turned and saw his fellow workman lying flat on the slanting roof slowly slipping toward the edge. He was working his whole body convulsively, and clutching at the slates, but, of course, unable to grasp them.

Kline shouted to him, but he did not answer. He only slipped further toward the edge. It took only a moment for Kline to realize that his assistant was in a fit and would plunge over the roof's edge to certain death in a few seconds unless rescued.

Kline did not pause to consider the risk, but clambered over the slanting roof with that surety of hold which only a long practiced roofer can command. He threw his left arm around his comrade, clutching the slates with his right hand and both feet.

He might have held him there, but Page, who was clearly in a fit, struggled violently. Despite Kline's every effort the two began to slip downward. Kline shouted with all the strength of his lungs, but there was no one to hear. He yelled to Page to keep quiet, but the stricken man only struggled the harder.

Down the slope the pair moved toward that edge. Kline spat upon his hand and pressed the slates, but he could not stop the steady descent. He moved his feet about frantically for some exorcism in the smoothness of the slates, but he found none. If Page would only stop struggling he might hold still, but the madman, gurgling and spitting, was in constant motion.

Oh, for some help! But what help could there be in that place? Still Kline did not cease to cry out. He knew that if he let go his comrade he might save himself, but he would not let him go.

And so they slipped down, slowly but surely, until the slates ceased and one of Kline's feet overhung the sixty foot abyss.

It was his last chance. He thrust his left toe sharply downward and it caught the gutter. With an effort he increased his foothold upon this slender support. His right leg was bent up under him, his right arm sprawling upward grasping the slates; his left arm clasped his struggling comrade.

There the pair halted. The single foothold in the gutter sufficed to hold them steady. For more than half an hour, according to Kline's reckoning, they remained there, Kline shouting for help, Page struggling like a madman. Kline began to grow faint with the struggle, when help came.

The roof window in the Marlborough Hotel was scarcely six feet away from the two men all this time. In it suddenly appeared a chambermaid, who, in seeing them, screamed, and ran away. This gave Kline renewed heart.

The maid's screams attracted the housekeeper who called Theodore Leneaux a colored hall boy, who happened to be on the floor. Leneaux ran to the window, climbed partly out on the church roof, and held by those within, succeeded in grasping Page's hand. He pulled him gently toward him, Kline pushing from the other side. In this way the two roofers were brought close under the hotel window.

Right here Page redoubled his struggles. Kline got both feet on the narrow iron gutter and gave all his strength to holding the man in check and Leneaux meantime held him firmly by the collar. But more help was needed before a rescue could be made, for the window was three feet above the roof.

At this juncture George Cavel, another colored boy, appeared, and head Leneaux succeeded in hauling Page in at the window. Kline, relieved of his charge, quickly climbed in after and nearly fainted when he realized that the awful strain was over.

Page rapidly recovered when he was once in the room and was soon able to go down stairs. He then went to his employer's office, accompanied by Kline. He had never had a fit before in all his sixteen years' experience as roofer.

Kline did not go back to work again, but Kline did, notwithstanding his awful experience of the morning.
